1. Where are you from? And how old are you now?

I'm originally from China. But over time, I realized that where you are from becomes less important than where you are going. I'm in my late thirties now. At this stage of life, I feel that identity is no longer something fixed. It's something shaped by experience, responsibility, and time. I don't feel like I belong to just one place anymore. I feel more connected to the journey itself.

2. When did you come to the U.S.?

I came to the United States in my twenties. At that time, I didn't have a clear vision. What I had was curiosity and a certain level of dissatisfaction with predictability. I think many people choose stability. But I was more interested in uncertainty, because uncertainty forces you to confront who you really are.

3. What is your focus in America?

In the U.S., I focused on building companies, but over time I realized that business is only a surface. What we are really building is structure, trust, and time. A company is a way to organize human effort across years or even decades. It's almost philosophical, because you are designing systems that will outlive you.

4. Why did you choose the U.S.?

The U.S. represents a kind of openness. Not perfection, but openness. It allows different ideas, different failures, and different paths. That environment is very important for innovation. More importantly, it lets people redefine themselves.

5. Was there a moment that changed your life?

One moment changed my life: I stood alone in an empty warehouse late at night. It was quiet, and I suddenly understood something simple but powerful: Freedom and fear always come together. If you want freedom, you must accept uncertainty. If you want security, you must accept limitation. From that point, I stopped trying to eliminate uncertainty. I started learning how to live with it.

6. How has your career shaped your view of your industry?

At first, I saw the industry as competition. Now I see it as evolution. Industries are like ecosystems. They go through cycles—chaos, growth, regulation, maturity. Many people only focus on the growth phase, but the real value is built in the maturity phase. So today, I focus more on long-term structure than short-term
Opportunity.

7. Has your career shaped your character?

Yes. It taught me patience. In the beginning, you want fast results. Later, you realize that meaningful things take time. It also taught me humility. Because no matter how successful you become, the market, technology, and time will always outlast you.

8. Impact on the industry?

I don't think in terms of impact. I think in terms of contribution. Most meaningful change is incremental. Small improvements in safety, design, and standards, repeated over many years, can reshape an entire industry without people even noticing. Most of the time, real progress is quiet.

9. How has the U.S. changed your identity?

It made me realize that identity is a process. I still carry traditional values like family and responsibility, but I also embrace change and individuality. Now I see myself as someone between cultures, and I think that position gives me a unique perspective. It lets me connect different systems and ways of thinking.

10. A meaningful place in LA?

My backyard. It may sound simple, but simplicity is powerful. After years of pressure and uncertainty, a quiet space becomes meaningful. When I stand there, I don't think about business. I think about time. About the past and the future. It reminds me that success is not only about growth. It's also about balance and continuity.
